Daggers kept the barrel of the gun in his hand and drew his hunting-knife. As Scenes at the Faneral of a Distinthe bear rushed upon him he shoved the gun-barrel in its mouth and plunged his knife into its vitals. This fortunate was what saved the hunter's life, for in the terrible struggle that ensued he was unable to inflict any other wound on the animal. The bear wrenched the gun-barrel from Daggers's hand, and with a blow of his forepaw knocked the hunter to the ground. In the fall Daggers dropped his knife. Finally, by the tearing loose of his clothing under the sharp claws of the bear, he escaped once more. The flesh on his shoulders was badly torn, and Daggers grew faint from the pain. The bear followed him up so closely that they were again in hand-to-hand contest. The bear was visibly growing weaker, and the hunter's strength was also gradually leaving him. He tried to run but could not, and the result now depended on whether the hunter or the bear gave out first. For several minutes they struggled together among the scrub-oaks until Daggers felt that he could hold out no longer, although the bear staggered and fell and rose with difficulty. The hunter took two or three quick steps to one side and fell to the ground unconscious. He does not know how long he lay insensible, but when he revived he tried to get up and could not.
